Course description and objective:

Around the world, cities have always been places where diverse groups of people come together and interact. This course considers gender, sexuality, and urban space, drawing on feminist, anthropological, and other literature. We will read ethnographies (case studies) based in cities of the Global South and North in an effort to understand how urban lives vary depending on gender, race, sexuality, social class, nationality, and other social differences. Some of the themes we will examine include the following: the growth of urban centers and informal economic sectors as a result of neoliberalism and globalization; the emergence of youth cultures as populations expand; the increase of exclusionary practices that target specific groups in urban societies; the growth of social movements including those representing the citizenship rights of women and sexual minorities; the development of popular culture and new consumer practices. The course will highlight the gendered effects of accelerated change in cities as diverse as New York, Bangkok, and Mexico City. Videos and occasional recommended outside lectures will complement course material. In general, the course format will be lectures on Mondays and Wednesday, and discussion groups on Fridays.
