Hamlet: Like Mother, Like Son

R. Allen Shoaf

For if the King like not the Comedy,
Why then, belike he likes it not, pardie.

Hamlet 3.2.269-70

metal ... app. related in some way to μεταλλάν to seek after, explore.

OED 2, M: 667

As Great Shapesphere puns it.

James Joyce, Finnegans Wake 295.3-4

“Do you like me, Kate?” asks Henry V. “Pardonnez-moi, I cannot tell vat is `like me’” (Henry V 5.2.107-8). So culminates an extensive logic of “likeness” in the Henriad. 1 Deflecting likeness throughout his career, because he can brook no likeness if his rule is to be absolute, Henry V finally confronts, in Kate’s French body and halting English tongue, the absolute consequences of the politics as well as the logic of likeness. How can one like the king when no one is like the king? Did not the king, after all, destroy his likenesses, Falstaff and Hotspur? History will only too bitterly prove that the king has no likeness when Henry VI ascends the throne. The king, in fact, has no likeness but himself: the king is so different, and practices such difference, that no one can tell, as Falstaff already understood, what is “like [him]” (i Henry IV 2.5.228).2

---

1 As I have shown in “For there is figures in all things’: Juxtology in Shakespeare, Spenser, and Milton.” This essay is the published version of the plenary address I gave at the Citadel Conference on Medieval and Renaissance Studies in March 1988, organized by David Allen and Robert White.

I first began the current and related studies in conjunction with my work on “duals” and “duels” in Milton’s poetry during a Fellowship year funded by the National Endowment for the Humanities (1982-83). My work with Hamlet, in particular, began in the mid-eighties and shows the results of my early engagement with the writings of Lacan, whose particular essay on Hamlet has also played a role in the present study.

I am pleased to acknowledge the NEH again for another Fellowship, this year (1999-2000), during which I have been able to complete and revise this essay.

2 The full text of the relevant passage reads:

FALSTAFF ’Sblood, you starveling, you elf-skin, you dried neat’s tongue, you bull’s pizzle, you stock-fish—O, for breath to utter what is like thee!—you tailor’s yard, you sheath, you bowcase, you vile standing tuck—

PRINCE Well, breathe a while, and then to’ t again, and when thou hast tired thyself in base comparisons, hear me speak but this.

2.5.226-32; emphasis added
In Hamlet (1601), which is closely related to Henry V (1599), the logic of likeness will play itself [71-72] out again, though this time with more thrilling as they are also more terrifying consequences. “Is it not like the King?” Marcellus asks Horatio when the ghost appears, and Horatio replies “As thou art to thyself” (1.1.57-58; emphasis added). But Hamlet says, only a short while later, “‘A was a man, take him for all in all, / I shall not look upon his like again’” (1.2.186-87; emphasis added). And his lament can hardly fail to trouble us the more because we have just heard him scorn “my uncle, / My father’s brother, ... no more like my father / Than I to Hercules” (1.2.151-53; emphasis added). Whether too much or too little, like(ness), from the beginning, stalks the characters’ talk — and thus our response as well.¹

These instances, with a great many others (like occurs over 90 times in the play), suggest the thesis and the argument that I wish to pursue in this essay—namely, that one discourse for explaining the tragedy of Hamlet is that of the crisis of likeness, of which the psychopathology most revulsive, as it is also most recurrent, in Western culture’s self-representation, is incest. I argue, in particular, that Hamlet fears most uncontrollably his likeness not with his father, nor with Claudius, nor Horatio, nor Laertes, nor Fortinbras, nor Rosencrantz, nor Guildenstern, nor the players, nor Osric, nor Polonius, nor Ophelia, nor Yorick, but rather—and it is, after this list, precisely obvious who comes next—with his mother, Gertrude.² Hamlet is, indeed, as others have shown, like all these other characters in the play in some particular or particulars; but it is the likeness with Gertrude that he fears the most, not only the likeness with her bespoken by his and her sexual desires but also the likeness bespoken by his and her identities. Incest is not only copulation, incest is also copying. And how if Hamlet should be a copy of Gertrude? How if he should desire his father as she did? How, if he should desire Claudius, as she does? (The homoerotic pervades this world, saturated as it may be with the heteroerotic.) How if he desired Hamlet’s death (Oedipus’ conundrum) as she did? How stands it then in Denmark? How stands it then with Hamlet? How, to be blunt, stands it?

I take it that at least part of Hamlet’s crisis, and at least one reason for his (in)famous hesitation, is the question of succession: “A little more than kin and less than kind” (1.2.65) and never king. Hamlet is less than kind toward Claudius because Claudius has made him more than kin, usurping the place of his father as well as the place of his mother’s husband,

All citations of Shakespeare’s texts in this essay are from The Norton Shakespeare.

Spevack lists thousands of occurrences of like in Shakespeare. I plan to study them all and to publish my findings, from time to time, in such essays as this one and the one cited above in note one.

¹ Such s/talking is most terrifying, in all of Shakespeare’s characters, in Iago, who, as his name says (*I*ago = “I act, perform, do, or play”), likes, or not, whomever and however it serves his plot — in 1/ago we hear the d/evil of a word.

² Like all readers of Hamlet, I owe a debt to Adelman; I have read her justly famous essay both in Suffocating Mothers and in Wofford’s Hamlet Case Study — I cite the Case Study version since it is likelier to be more widely available. My chief difference from Adelman, after my focus on like itself, is my emphasis on Hamlet’s (con)fusio3n with his parents; or, put it this way, for me incest is as much trope as it is psychopathology.

I am also indebted, here and elsewhere in this essay, to Calderwood (63, in particular, in this instance), and to the splendid studies by Parker.
and thus interposed himself between Hamlet and Hamlet.5 (I will ignore, for reasons that I think are obvious, the distinction between Hamlet, Sr. and Hamlet, Jr.; Ophelia is my witness [cf. Garber 299; Calderwood 94]: “And with a look so piteous in purport / As if he had been loosèd out of hell / To speak of horrors, he comes before me” [2.1.83-5; emphasis added].) As long as Claudius reigns (“He that hath killed my king, and whored my mother, / Popped in between th’election and my hopes” [5.2.65-66]), Hamlet cannot succeed to his (father’s) throne. The sequence kin > kind cries out the missing graph. And if Hamlet is not to be (kin, kind), then whom is Hamlet (to) like?6

The answer is as strange to him as it is to us, at least at first. In the political logic on which the play insists, he is like Gertrude. He is like Gertrude because, blocked from the succession, he is in the feminine position (“Must, [72-73] like a whore, unpack my heart with words / And fall a-cursing like a very drab, / A scullion” 2.2.563-65; cf. Adelman 274). Hamlet (t-h-[e] m-a-l-e) is marked feminine (cf. Leverenz; see also Parker, Margins, 263). And it is from the feminine position that he must act for almost the rest of his life. Castrated and defective (the misogynist’s icon of the despised female [“frailty, thy name is woman” (1.2.146)]), Hamlet lacks the Phallus. But, more, he is the site of the lack of the Phallus (at least in the patriarchal imaginary) — madness (thy name is woman).8 Little wonder he does not like himself, he is not like himself: “For he was likely, had he been put on / To have proved most royally” (5.2.341-42; emphasis added). But what “he” would have been put on? — this he or that he, that is the question.9

The case I am making can be illustrated in a number of places in the play, but the following cross-section of Act I will perhaps be most helpful (emphasis added).

Marcellus Look where it comes again.

5 Cf. The Norton Shakespeare (1660): “... Hamlet hides within himself a spirit of political resistance, a subversive challenge to a corrupt, illegitimate regime shored up by lies, spies, and treachery.”

6 For a different, although not unrelated reading of this line, see Lupton and Reinhard, who argue, in particular — and helpfully, I think — that “as a pun about punning, about linguistic and sexual similarity and difference, the line enacts the structural incest between literal incest and incest of the letter” (3).

7 I will represent anagrams in this essay in this form: I am concerned to represent letters in all their insistence and (seeming) impertinence.

8 That is, le Nom-du-Père does not function in Hamlet to support the Symbolic order: see Lacan’s Écrits, 278 and 577ff.; see also Evans, 119.

9 Notice now the excruciating irony of Hamlet’s Hercules proportion —

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Claudius</th>
<th>Hamlet</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>¥</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

| Old Hamlet | Hercules |

As even someone with little Latin and less Greek would know, Hercules was the victim of a woman, Hera, throughout his life (Gr. Ἡρακλής (-κλής), Ἡρα, Hera, wife of Zeus + κλέος glory, renown, lit. ‘having or showing the glory of Hera’ — OED II, sub voce]. In other words, all four men are, tragically, just alike, showing the glory of Her(a).
BARNARDO In the same figure, like the King that’s dead. ...
BARNARDO Looks it not like the King? — Mark it, Horatio.
HORATIO Most like: It harrows me with fear and wonder.
1.1.38-42

MARCELLUS Is it not like the King?
HORATIO As thou art to thy self.
1.1.57-58

HAMLET A was a man, take him for all in all,
I shall not look upon his like again.
HORATIO My Lord, I think I saw him yesternight.
HAMLET Saw? Who?
1.2.186-89

HORATIO A figure like your father,
Armed at all points exactly, cap à pie,
Appears ...
The apparition comes. I knew your father;
These hands are not more like.
1.2.199-212

HORATIO It would have much amazed you.
HAMLET Very like, very like.
1.2.234-35

This sample may serve as a guide. It registers the insistence in the play on the almost independent agency of like(ness).

If we take this sample as a guide, we will find that the play charges the word like with a sometimes almost unbearable predictivity (and productivity):

HORATIO If your mind dislike anything, obey it. I will forestall their repair hither, and say you are not fit.
5.2.155-56; emphasis added  [73-74]

I am arguing that only when we have paused, if just a (heart)beat, over the words “if your mind dislike,” can we begin to take the measure of what follows:

HAMLET Not a whit. We defy augury. There’s a special providence in the fall of a sparrow. If it be now, ‘tis not to come. If it be not to come, it will be now. If it be not now, yet it will come. The readiness is all. Since no man has aught of what he leaves, what is’t to leave betimes?
5.2.157-61

We hear, now, how “their repair hither” will actually pair Hamlet, and spare him (even a sparrow), with the likeness in which he will leave this life, as ready as a man can be (“since no man has aught [but also: has sought]10 of what he leaves, what is’t to leave betimes”?), foil now (5.2.192), likeness even, to Laertes (“This likes me well,” Hamlet says of his foil [5.2.203;

10 See Stewart passim on perception of juncture in poetic discourse.
emphasis added]) in that “foolery ... such a kind of gain-giving as would perhaps trouble a woman” (5.2.153-54), which he feels “about [his] heart—but it is no matter” (5.2.150-51), since he is now about to cross the woman, the mater, out,” resume his likeness, assume the Phallus, and its awful price, death:

HAMLET Was’t Hamlet wronged Laertes? Never Hamlet.
If Hamlet from himself be ta’en away,
And when he’s not himself does wrong Laertes,
Then Hamlet does it not, Hamlet denies it.
Who does it then? His madness. If’t be so,
Hamlet is of the faction that is wronged,
His madness is poor Hamlet’s enemy.

5.2.170-76

If Hamlet now from himself is not taken away—if he is coincident with himself now, if he is one with himself, if his madness is gone, if he is like himself (in the Symbolic with the reign of the Phallus)—then, clearly, such sanity, at least here, is prologue to murder and, perhaps, worse. laertes responds: “I do receive your offered love like love, / And will not wrong it” (5.2.188-89; emphasis added). The depth of Laertes’ hatred presumably we must measure by the likes of the fissure opened in his love by like(ness). The treachery of like(ness) perhaps nowhere in poetry receives more vivid likening; and post-modernism’s agony over representation of all sorts is perhaps nowhere more tersely represented in early modern literature: love like love is not love.¹³

¹¹ I follow Lacan to understand and represent the overturning of the generality of the woman in Hamlet’s emerging self-consciousness: the illusion of the woman is gradually fading before the reality of this particular woman, Gertrude; see “God and the Jouissance of The Woman” and “A Love Letter.”

On the importance to understanding Hamlet of the wordplay between Latin mater and English matter (which derives from mater), see Ferguson, esp. 294-5; see also Parker, Margins, 254, 263.

¹² F1 continues Hamlet’s speech just quoted, crucially from my perspective, with

HAMLET Sir, in this Audience,
Let my disclaiming from a purpos’d euill,
Free me so farre in your most generous thoughts,
That I have shot mine Arrow o’re the house,
And hurt my Mother.

5.2.177-81 (in F’s orthography)

Q1 and Q2 have “brother,” which may in the end be a better reading, but I wish to observe that the textual history of the play includes, if only as an error, the agony as well as the irony of Hamlet’s renewed “sanity.” See, further, The Norton Shakespeare, which also cites this variant (1752).

¹³ As others have noted, the rhetorical device most frequent in Hamlet that bears the burden of splitting/doubling is hendiadys; see Holland (167):

... one of the tragedy’s two characteristic figures of speech: hendiadys, which means
Like derives from a root meaning “form” or “shape” and in Anglo-Saxon means “body” (Dutch, Danish, and Swedish instances of the word mean “corpse”).

I think it would be difficult to exaggerate how important this history is to the tragedy of Hamlet: in a different body (a son’s), Hamlet is nonetheless insufficiently different from his father or his mother, too like them (especially his mother), to enter into his patrimony or his matrimony; separation in Hamlet and for Hamlet has failed, and thus incest, the scandal of (con)fusion (failure of separation), haunts him throughout the play. Thus, to take one easily overlooked expressing a single idea by two nouns or adjectives parted by a conjunction: “the sensible and true avouch of mine own eyes,” “the gross and scope of mine opinion” ...

The word like can be understood to spawn perverse hendiadys: splitting where there should be no division—“love like love.” From this perspective, the word can also be seen as an agent of Spaltung, which Lacan, following but modifying Freud, reminds us, is “cette refente ... que le sujet subit de n’être sujet qu’en tant qu’il parle” (Écrits 634), “the split which the subject undergoes by virtue of being a subject only in so far as he speaks” (trans. Sheridan 269; emphasis added).

On the other hand is isocolon (Ferguson 293): “balanced clauses joined by ‘and’,” which is the rhetorical device favored by Claudius:

... the principle of similarity ... governs Claudius’s syntax ... Claudius’s isocolonic style is also characteristically oxymoronic: opposites are smoothly joined by syntax and sound, as for instance in these lines from his opening speech:

Therefore our sometime sister, now our queen,
Th’imperial jointress to this warlike state,
Have we, as ’twere with a defeated joy,
With an auspicious and a dropping eye,
With mirth in funeral and with dirge in marriage,
In equal scale weighing delight and dole,
Taken to wife

I.ii.8-14

For another view of splitting, hendiadys, and doubling in Hamlet, see Kerrigan (79-81).

14 See Skeat, sub voce; also Ayto, 295. For a discussion of Shakespeare’s neologism “incorpsed” (4.7.72), see Ferguson, 301ff.

15 And to the “tragedy” of Hamlet: the notorious difficulty of the play’s genre, even its scandal, can be compassed, at least partially, just here: Hamlet is obviously like “revenge tragedy” and, just as obviously, it is not—Hamlet, like Hamlet, is trying to break free from its likeness to predecessors.

16 In what I consider one of his most moving meditations on the human condition, Lacan writes, in “Position de l’inconscient” (I quote at some, though not full, length from Écrits, 843):

Separare, séparer, ici se termine en se parere, s’engendrer soi-même.... ce glissement du sens d’un verbe à l’autre.... est fondé dans leur commun appariement à la fonction de la pars.
La partie n’est pas le tout, comme on dit, mais d’ordinaire inconsidérément. Car il faudrait accentuer qu’elle n’a avec le tout rien à faire. Il faut en prendre son parti, elle joue sa partie toute seule. Ici, c’est de sa partition que le sujet procède à sa parturition. Et ceci n’implique pas la métaphore grotesque qu’il se mette au monde à nouveau. Ce que d’ailleurs le langage serait bien embarrassé d’exprimer d’un terme originel, au moins dans l’aire de l’indoeuropéen où tous les mots utilisés à cet emploi ont une origine juridique ou sociale. Parere, c’est d’abord procurer—(un enfant au mari). C’est pourquoi le sujet peut se procurer ce qui ici le concerne, un état que nous qualifierons de civil. Rien dans la vie d’aucun ne déchaîne plus d’acharnement à y arriver. Pour être pars, il sacrifierait bien une grande part de ses intérêts....

Mais ce qu’il comble ainsi n’est pas la faille qu’il rencontre dans l’Autre, c’est d’abord celle de la perte constituant d’une de ses parts, et de laquelle il se trouve en deux parts constitué. Là gît la torsion par laquelle la séparation représente le retour de l’aliénation. C’est qu’il opère avec sa propre perte, qui le ramène à son départ.

I despair of any adequate translation of this testimony. But I will say that this meditation, on the subject moving from “sa partition ... à sa parturition,” from his parting to his birth to his departing, seems to me also to express some crucial part of Shakespeare’s art.

17 On “close” in the play, see Parker, Margins, 254-5, who also notes the play with “closet” (254).

18 Cf. Adelman, 264-5; Calderwood, 63; and Fineman, 89 especially.

19 Here I acknowledge my debt to Girard and Serres, the two theorists of doubling and competition/comparison from whom I have learned the most about these issues. In particular, I wish to record my admiration for the work of Serres, especially The Parasite, from which I feel I have learned a great deal. I owe a debt, also, to the work of Fineman.
chasmic, no communication at all obtains; too little difference and the space is chasmic, (con)fused threatening to overwhelm communication. Nowhere in art is this terrifying logic more palpable and threatening than in theater, for theater is the space of likeness—without likeness theater is impossible.\footnote{Even in the post-modern, I take it, since the premise of likeness must be present in order to be deconstructed. Cf. Calderwood, 192.}

Hence \textit{The Mousetrap}, the postscript that is also a prescript (cf. Cavell 189-91):

\begin{center}
\begin{tabular}{l}
HAMLET I'll have these players  \\
Play something \textit{like} the murder of my father ...  \\
2.2.571-2; emphasis added
\end{tabular}
\end{center}

\begin{center}
\begin{tabular}{l}
KING CLAUDIUS What do you call the play?  \\
HAMLET \textit{The Mousetrap}. Marry, how? Tropically. This play is the \textit{image} of a murder done in Vienna.  \\
3.2.215-18; emphasis added
\end{tabular}
\end{center}

The play within the play is the incest of the play (the play playing with its own), the perverse doubling that foregrounds drama’s perpetual disruption of the boundaries between self and other, male and female, inner and outer, etc. More than the specular \textit{mise en abîme} of post-modernism, this moment, when the tropical is the trapical, tropes as it traps the founding anxiety of Western thought, not that all knowledge is mimetic (hence derivative, secondary, belated—Plato’s grievance [cf. Parker, \textit{Margins}, 180]) but that it is anamnesic, a recalling of the always already forgotten (Plato’s Socratic reverie\footnote{See the \textit{Meno}, 368-71. For an excellent meditation on memory in \textit{Hamlet}, see Garber, 328ff., especially.}). For this is what is trapped and troped in the play within the play, where the mouse that is trapped is not Claudius, not Claudius at all (cf. Adelman 275-76; Parker, \textit{Margins}, 265), but rather her whom Hamlet calls Claudius’ “mouse,” his mother Gertrude (3.4.167)—that soft, round, furry thing.\footnote{Which was not stirring at the beginning—}

\begin{center}
\begin{tabular}{l}
BERNARDO Have you had quiet guard?  \\
FRANCISCO Not a mouse stirring.  \\
1.1.7-8
\end{tabular}
\end{center}

Here it is pertinent to note that repetition in \textit{Hamlet} is often a smear of words, a certain stain, that spreads across the play even as rottenness spreads through Elsinore and Denmark; and \textit{like}(ness) itself (known otherwise as the “body”) is the (name of the) contagion. See, also, Parker, \textit{Margins}, 218: “Words themselves are coupled in this play with a sense of pestilent breeding ....”
I.  And so he waits for Claudius, to conclaude his trap. And at the moment of closure, he observes, if the King like not the comedie,

    Why then, belike he likes it not, pardie.

3.2.269-70; emphasis added

The misprision is exact: it is not a “comedie” (rather a “tragedy” [3.2.133]), but it is (an invitation) to come die (I retain F’s spelling of comedie) and so the king likes it not, pardie (“I like him not, nor stands it safe with us” [3.3.1; emphasis added]). No, Hamlet’s hesitation is not a problem of knowledge, it is a problem of I.D.-ing, of becoming able, finally, to say “This is I, / Hamlet the Dane!” (5.1.243-44) — which amounts to saying (let us not flinch from admitting it): “I did it, I am to blame.” Every child bereaved of a parent “knows,” at some level, that s/he killed that parent (herein, for me, lies the genius of Cavell’s reading of The Mousetrap [179-91]; and (dis)owning that “knowledge” (which is false but feels, all the same, very real) can be so great a burden the child does not, can not survive it: “How stand I then, / That have a father kill’d, a mother stain’d” (4.4.56-7; cf. Adelman 280). Indeed, how does Hamlet stand?

Laertes, I take it, has an I.D. all along—he is Polonius’ (and his [absent] mother’s) son, Ophelia’s brother: he is the one who r-e-l-a-t-e-s:

POLONIUS This above all—to thine own self be true,
    And it must follow, as the night the day,
    Thou canst not then be false to any man.

1.3.78-80

It is his role to relate (within the Symbolic) in just that way that defines Hamlet’s failure to relate:

KING CLAUDIUS Laertes, was your Father dear to you?
    Or are you like the painting of a sorrow,
    A face without a heart?
LAERTES Why ask you this?
KING CLAUDIUS Not that I think you did not love your father ...

4.7.89-93; emphasis added
Of course not; of course, Laertes loved his father; there can be no question, etc. But that, of course, really is not the question. The question really is, how is it that Laertes a-l-t-e-r-(e)-s Hamlet’s ego? how is it that Laertes’ I.D. alters Hamlet’s I? We may answer this question with Girard, with Serres, with Lacan, with Fineman, with Adelman, with Freud, with Cavell, with Parker, [76-77] with Irigaray, with Baudrillard, with Levi-Strauss, and perhaps with others who have addressed themselves in our recent cultural critique to the crisis of doubling. But fundamental to any answer we may offer will be the play’s prior insight that the subject is not a subject except as anOther—

HAMLET I dare not confess that, lest I should compare with him in excellence. But to know a man well were to know himself

5.2.102-32 —
even as the subject cannot speak without an (H)oratio (“speech”) other to it:

HAMLET O God, Horatio, what a wounded name,
Things standing thus unknown, shall live behind me!
If thou didst ever hold me in thy heart,
Absent thee from felicity a while,
And in this harsh world draw thy breath in pain
To tell my story.

5.2.286-91

Everywhere Hamlet turns, he confronts the reality of incest, which is hardly reducible to mere copulation—incest is also copying (fusion and confusion). And to grasp the import of incest as copying in Hamlet, it is necessary finally to confront one of the scandals of the play, or its indulgence in puns—“We must speak by the card, or equivocation will undo us” (5.1.126-7). A pun is incestuous, the copulation of signifiers that should remain separate, producing a word containing imperfect copies of other words (Shoaf, Milton, 60-71). Moreover, says Dr. Johnson (21-22):

A quibble [i.e. pun] is to Shakespeare what luminous vapours are to the traveller; he follows it at all adventures, it is sure to lead him out of his way, and sure to engulf him in the mire. It has some malignant power over his mind, and its fascinations are irresistible. Whatever be the dignity or profundity of his disquisition, whether he be enlarging knowledge or exalting affection, whether he be amusing attention with incidents or entraining it in suspense, let but a quibble spring up before him, and he leaves his work unfinished. A quibble is the golden apple for which he will always turn aside from his career, or stoop from his elevation. A quibble, poor and barren as it is, gave him such delight, that he was content to purchase it, by the sacrifice of reason, propriety, and truth. A quibble was to him the fatal Cleopatra for which he lost the world, and was content to lose it.

In many respects, this is an inexactaggerably important piece of criticism (and not just of

—

25 And see also 5.2.75-78: HAMLET “For by the image of my cause I see / The portraiture of his.”

26 See also the helpful comments by Calderwood, 8off., 174f., and 194; Ferguson, 292-5; and Parker, Margins, tff.
Shakespeare), but for my purposes what matters most in it is the demonizing of “quibbles” that culminates in the (predictable) demonizing of the woman (Cleopatra). You just know a pun has got to be (a) female:

HAMLET Do you think I meant country matters?
OPHELIA I think nothing, my lord.
HAMLET That’s a fair thought to lie between maids’ legs.
OPHELIA What is, my lord?
HAMLET No thing.
OPHELIA You are merry, my lord?

3.2.105-110  [77-78]

Hardly the least famous pun in English literature, “country matters” will do just nicely to make the point (“thing”): a pun like “c(o)unt(ry) mat(t)ers” is a no thing\(^{27}\) (a “cunt mother”) — that is to say, irreducibly plural (“ce sexe qui n’en est pas un”), its lips are bilabial, twofold, geminated, double.\(^{28}\) A pun like “c(o)unt(ry) mat(t)ers” scandalizes the Phallus, the realm of the Symbolic, which likes things hard and fast. And so Hamlet puns. This m-e-t-a-l Hamlet, who finds Ophelia “mettle more attractive” (3.2.99), puns remorselessly throughout the play, even unto the very end—“The rest is silence” (5.2.300)—and precisely scandalizes those who serve the Symbolic (and in turn are served by it):

KING CLAUDIUS How fares our cousin Hamlet?
HAMLET Excellent, i’faith, of the chameleon’s dish. I eat the air, promise-crammed. You cannot feed capons so.
KING CLAUDIUS I have nothing with this answer, Hamlet. These words are not mine.
HAMLET No, nor mine now. [To POLONIUS] My lord, you played once i’th’ university, you say.
POLONIUS That I did my Lord, and was accounted a good actor.
HAMLET And what did you enact?
POLONIUS I did enact Julius Caesar. I was killed i’th’ Capitol. Brutus killed me.
HAMLET It was a brute part of him, to kill so Capital a calf there.

3.2.84-96; emphasis added

“These words are not mine.” Indeed. That is the question. Whose are the words?\(^{29}\) some “c-H-A-M-E-L-eon’s”? The words “my desire” can be uttered by any one of hundreds of millions of speakers of English. And shall I labor under the illusion that my desire is special?

---

\(^{27}\) On “thing” and “thing of nought” in Shakespeare, see Willbern (and for the obscene sense, in particular, his notes 3 and 4 [260]). This essay is now reprinted in his book, Poetic Will, 125-42. I wish to acknowledge here an enduring debt to Burckhardt, “King Lear: The Quality of Nothing” (237-59).

\(^{28}\) I cite, of course, Irigaray, Ce sexe qui n’en est pas un, one of the most important works of French feminist critique, in part just because of the power of the p(as)un in its title.

\(^{29}\) About the line “I did enact Julius Caesar. I was killed i’th’ Capitol,” The Norton Shakespeare informs us: “Perhaps an allusion to Shakespeare’s own Julius Caesar; the actor who first played Polonius may also have played the part of Caesar” (1710). Here, I propose, is also the incest of drama, playing with its own: “It was a brute part [role, as well as appendage] of him, to kill so Capital a calf there.”
Why, of course, I shall. So does everyone. So does Hamlet. Which, of course, is why he is (apparently) mad. To make words one’s own is to appropriate them to meanings so idiotic (as well as idiolectal) as to sound mad:

POLONIUS What is the matter, my lord?
HAMLET Between who?
POLONIUS I mean the matter you read, my lord.

2.2.193-95

But then madness has a way of sounding different:

POLONIUS Though this be madness, yet there is method in’t.—Will you walk out of the air, my lord?
HAMLET Into my grave.
POLONIUS Indeed, that is out o’th’ air. [Aside] How pregnant sometimes his replies are? A happiness that often madness hits on, which reason and sanity could not so prosperously be delivered of.

2.2.203-20; emphasis added  [78-79]

Madness, punning, has a way of sounding like (a) woman: pregnant and delivered of meanings in which Reason and Sanity (the Symbolic) are not so pro(s)per-ous, puns (two meanings in one sound) are the fee males must pay to speak:

HAMLET Yet I,
A dull and muddy-mettled rascal, peak
Like John-a-dreams, unpregnant of my cause,
And can say nothing ...

2.2.543-46; emphasis added

Until he is pregnant, Hamlet “can say nothing.” In order to speak, Hamlet must give birth:

CLAUDIUS Love? His affections do not that way tend,
Nor what he spake, though it lacked form a little,
Was not like madness. There’s something in his soul
O’er which his melancholy sits on brood,
And I do doubt, the hatch and the disclose
Will be some danger...

3.1.161-66; emphasis added

In order to be, Hamlet must be(come) female — at the least, he must trope himself as female, and this he does by punning, for in his mad punning he participates in that two-in-one-ness that yokes madness, punning, and woman. All are improper (i.e., promiscuous, but also 30 On the “proper” and the problematics of “property” in regard to the senses of words, see the essay by Derrida. From one perspective, this is among the oldest problems in Western philosophy. Plato is concerned with it, for example, in the Cratylus. Heidegger addresses it especially in the essay “Logos (Heraclitus, Fragment B 50).” See also, for historical overview, Parker, Ladies, 36ff.

metaphoric), and they prosper in pregnancy and delivery, in breeding (not to mention talkativeness). And we know what scandal attends such (s)excess: “Get thee to a nunnery. Why wouldst thou be a breeder of sinners?” (3.1.122-23). Ophelia must be chastised, even if she should be chaste, “for the power of beauty will sooner transform honesty from what it is to a bawd than the force of honesty can translate beauty into his likeness” (3.1.113-15; emphasis added). Ophelia must be (a) nun/none, threat to “unpregnant” Hamlet that she is — “ti opheilô; what do I owe?” as he might say.32 After all, she is the thing of nought, O(we), that naughty thing, waiting to be filled — O feel/fill ya, the alpha and the omega (reversed), lacking only one vow-el, u."33

Surely, Hamlet rocks us so just because in its madness it teaches us what we pay for the (communal illusion of the) straight and true, the hard and fast, the pure and simple, etc.: we pay in reality — in the loss of reality — for copies of our desire proliferating in the Symbolic. Every line you draw, every definition you make, “every breath you take, I'll be watching you.” The Police, of course, are another name for the signifier, whose I, we have been told, is panoptic (Foucault 228). The more copies of ourselves we make, the more copies of our desires proliferate, the more likely our secrets are to secrete (the play oozes with secretions and secrets alike).

HAMLET So, oft it chances in particular men
That, for some vicious mole of nature in them— ...

1.4.18.7-18.8 [79-80]

HAMLET Well said, old mole. Canst work i'th earth so fast?
A worthy pioneer.

1.5.164-65

Even before the mole begins to dig under his feet, Hamlet, such m-e-t-a-l, “as Great Shapeshere puns it,” knows the mole has already mined his fault(-line): “[He] Shall in the general censure take corruption / From that particular fault” (1.4.18.19-20; and cf. Adelman 267-8). The ghost is but a copy of the mole Hamlet has seen already within himself (cf.

———

31 In the Latin rhetorical tradition, impropri is one word used to mean “metaphorically”; another, equally suggestive, is abusive (reflecting the Greek catachresis, “against usage”)—see Shoaf, Currency, 33-4 and notes 24-27.

32 Consider the two Greek verbs most like the name Ophelia (I transliterate to emphasize the likeness): opheilô, and ophellô, respectively, “owe, have to pay or account for,” and “increase, enlarge, strengthen” (Liddell-Scott-Jones). Hamlet owes Ophelia in many senses, not least perhaps in that she (if he makes her pregnant) increases and enlarges. He owes her his love, he owes her to her family, he owes her (potential) child by him to his lineage (the anxiety of the Patriarchy within the Symbolic). Ophelia not only represents, she is obligation. But, as the other Greek word like this word suggests, she also “advance[s a thing], make[s] it thrive”—she is “useful” (“ophelimity” [OED II, sub voce]): I find here, in debt and use, the obscure but palpable paradox of likeness itself.

33 Lest my irony be lost in the monotone of ideologizing, let me insist that I ventriloquize—I personally do not believe Ophelia deserves chastisement, even as, I know, my commentary here perforce chastises her all over again.
Holland 172), minor that he is. Hamlet is always already H-o-mlet (m-o-l-e), the homolette,\(^3\) or “little man” (and “broken egg”\(^3\))—that is, the \textit{infans} whose unorganized desire, like Claudius’ “rouse” (1.4.9), threatens arousal (because unlimited, without boundary) and hence also retaliation: the mole in Hamlet is desire for his mother, and so the mole outside Hamlet is (the Ghost’s) desire for his mother—Hamlet is frightened finally by Hamlet because finally Hamlet also desires Hamlet.\(^6\)

\(^3\) Lacan’s pun, of great importance, I think, to understanding \textit{Hamlet} (see the next note especially). Anika Lemaire (127) helpfully summarizes his argument (from 1966, “Discussion de l’article …”):

\begin{quote}
The new-born child, he says, makes one think of the androgynes described by Aristophanes in Plato’s \textit{Symposium}, or at least the state in which they were left after the division imposed on them by Zeus.

With the cutting of the umbilical cord, the new-born child, like the Androgynes, finds itself separated from a part of itself, torn from the mother’s internal membranes. Birth causes it to lose its anatomical complement.

The \textit{infans}, Lacan goes on, is like a broken egg which spreads out in the form of an \textit{homolette} [a portmanteau word meaning both “little man” and “omelette” (trans.)]. Allusion is made here to the instinct as it can be represented in its origins. To prevent the \textit{homolette} invading everything and destroying everything in its path, it must be enclosed, it must be assigned limits.

The libido, the instinct, will be maintained within corporeal limits and will henceforth be unable to flow completely other than by way of “erotogenic zones”, which are rather like valves opening towards and by the outside.

... the delimitation of the erotogenic zone has the effect of canalizing the libido (or functional metabolism) and transforming it into a “partial instinct”. The erotogenic zone is a cut or aperture inscribed in a suitable anatomical site: for example, the lips, the gap between the teeth, the edges of the anus, the tip of the penis, the vagina, the palpebral slit.

Limited and canalized in this way, the libido never appears in its entirety in the subjective world and a good part of it is lost. The permanent human feeling of dissatisfaction and incompleteness is therefore to be “mythically” explained by the separation the child undergoes at birth.
\end{quote}

\(^5\) Recall Claudius on Hamlet and eggs (3.1.161-66): I think it difficult to exaggerate how important Claudius’ intuition here is: he recognizes, if only subliminally, the woman in Hamlet, the egg-

\begin{.quote}
HAMLET So, oft it chances in particular men
That, for some vicious mole of nature in them—...

the dram of [z]eale

Doth all the noble substance of a doubt
To his own scandal.
\end{quote}

\(^6\) Hence the notorious crux, in this speech peculiar to Q2 (namely, “the dram of eale”), is amenable to a certain emendation:
Because the ghost is but a copy of the mole Hamlet has seen already within himself, we can almost hear him say, “would it were real,” or, perhaps more precise, “would it were a true copy.” Still, it would be a copy only and could not set him free. Not least of the many achievements in Shakespeare studies in our time has been the demonstration of the importance of copia to his writing. It seems obvious now that we should understand Shakespearean rhetoric explicitly in terms of copiousness. The obvious evidence of copiousness is a copy (they are the same word [Skeat 111; Cave 3-9]). If something is rotten in the state of Denmark, this is surely, as countless others before me have noted, because Elsinore is over-ripe ([s]-i-n-o-r-e-l-s-e), teeming with and overrun by copies—too many Hamlets, in particular, for example. The mystery of the play, which no reading will ever plumb or exhaust, seems most spectral here, where it adumbrates Shakespeare’s obsession with doubles, twins, mirrors, and copies (Fineman, Shakespeare’s Perjured Eye). As Shakespeare’s art is unimaginable without “quibbles,” so too is it unimaginable without twins: both puns and twins are two much in the same plays; and that seems to have been just the way he liked it.

I don’t know why. Coincidentia oppositorum? Paradox? Plotinus (“All knowing comes by likeness” [Plotinus, Ennead 1, Tractate 8, 66])? Increases in capital (Halperin; Kamps)? “The habit of arguing in utramque partem” (Altman 34)? Doubtless many answers will come from many others. But if I may, I will suggest the following. The method I have used in this essay I call juxtology (Shoaf, “The Play of Puns”). I use juxtology to approach what for Using some of the Norton edition’s glosses, I would paraphrase the text to say, with my emendation of “eale” to “[z]eale”: “the tiny amount (eighth of an ounce) of excess desire ([z]eale) does make all the noble substance part of a doubt, to his own scandal.”

This construction and paraphrase track and continue the logic of the earlier part of Hamlet’s speech where “o’ergrowth” and “o’erleavens” suggest a failure of proportion between the “vicious mole” (a tiny blemish) and the “virtues else ... as pure as grace” (1.4.18.17); in other words, my emendation “[z]eale” here would suggest exactly that excess (desire) only a “dram” of which, a tiny bit of which, would be enough to swell so as to overwhelm the “noble substance” to the point “of a doubt,” which, in turn, would be enough for “scandal.”

This, of course, is only conjecture.

37 See among others, Parker, Ladies, 13ff. For me, also, of enduring importance for understanding copia in Early Modern literature is the remarkable study by Cave.

38 Here it is relevant, not to mention proper, that I acknowledge these other scholars precisely by remarking that their copiousness empowers my ability to copy from them, as I learn from them, but also that my copying from them, to develop my own theses, attests to and legitimates their copiousness. The genealogy of learning is familial—and most of its crises are like those of a (more or less dysfunctional) family (in which incest is not unheard of). Have we here, I permit myself to wonder, one reason why Hamlet is the site of such immense scholarly and critical activity? Here, in this play, if anywhere, sons and daughters must separare in order to se parere (and my macaronic French and English is itself evidence of the crisis). Indeed, now perhaps, just so, is the time for me to acknowledge my likeness, and unlikeness, to Shell, who writes brilliantly of likeness and the lex talionis in Shakespeare (117-36, in particular); but not only did I develop my ideas before reading his work (the obligatory if petulant plea of professionalism), also I differ from him in my insistence on the uncanny sign of like(ness), even as I depend on him to explain so well “the movement ... from substitution and likeness to identification” (136).
me is one of the most provocative issues in life and art alike and, predictably, as vexing as it is provocative—namely, coincidence.\(^{39}\) I think, in particular, that it is the special effect of poetry to challenge, correct, and deepen the ordinary or accepted notion of coincidence, exposing in such a notion our efforts to “botch the words up fit to [our] own thoughts” (4.5.10), to constrain and control, by calling them coincidences, what are, in fact, complex connections of language and reality, juxtologues (kin-kind(-king) is a juxtologue in Hamlet’s world), that typically disturb, even frighten us, because they confront us with the uncanny feeling of our otherness (deja vous, if you like). Hamlet, I believe, is the juxtological play in Shakespeare’s writings: “O, ’tis most sweet / When in one line two crafts directly meet” (3.4.185.8-185.9); or again, “Your fat king and your lean beggar is but variable service—two dishes, but to one table. That’s the end” (4.3.23-4). Whatever autobiographical impulse or historical impingement may account for this distinction of the play, to it I propose we add the following, very simple complement: when the actor plays, he twins himself, assumes a juxta-pose between himself and the (other of the) character, and therein says to us, become a pun, “as you like it.”\(^{40}\)

---

\(^{39}\) I have entitled my next book of poems, almost complete, Songs of Coincidence; samples can be read on my WebPage.

\(^{40}\) With this conclusion, I look, obviously, to the probable chronology of the plays: As You Like It precedes Hamlet which is followed by Twelfth Night, or What You Will; all three plays concern themselves both with the subjectivity of like(ness) and the arbitrariness of the medium that signifies the like. For helpful comment on As You Like It, see Howard’s headnote in The Norton Shakespeare, esp. 1598.
LIST OF WORKS CITED

Reinhard, Kenneth. See Lupton.

Rose, Jacqueline. See Mitchell.

Schwartz, Murray M. See Kahn.

White. See Allen.
